As in every true grand opera each character was identified by a theme, and whenever that personage was men tioned the proper motif was syncopated forth by wailing violins, tooting saxoshones and angling bells, while the audience grew more helpless with each jazzy explosion. It was typical of the whole performance—everything was done with just the proper jazz note of slight exaggeration, so that the humor was real and refreshing without degenerating nto meaningless eccentricity, and the by sliding up and down on the floor as hough he was playing the town pump. Each one of the young men, who come from Michigan, appeared to be an artist in his line—a real player, capable of playing classics as well as raising Cain musically. The expert drummer had an armory of trick devices that looked like a spiritualistic outfit. And Santrey, whose fine barytone used-to be heard here at the Hippodrome, displayed a deft virtuosity, not only singing a solo admirably but conducting the band with insummate comedy, even to leading the plano player in a solo. Musically as well as acrobatically the act gives speedy, bona fide entertainment, and at the finish, after two encores, the rear curtains shimmled most appropriately. This band threatens to become a cult.
